

Emeritus: A Professors Story

The author was born in a place called Cherokee at the edge of a small rural village in southwestern Indiana. His father was of English origin and his mother carried Native American blood. Each of his siblings completed college degrees and, like himself, contributed to the society in significant ways. His Ph.D. was from Purdue University and as a U.S. Army officer he attained the rank of Major. As a university faculty member he was promoted through the ranks to Full Professor. At the time of the present dialogue, it seemed like eons of time had passed since that day when he was capriciously retired with the rank of Emeritus Professor. At that time the university was under the dark clouds of a state tax measure that was meant to legally reduce departments and existing faculty. During and previous to his tenure he had received several distinguished best teaching and research scholar awards and was a master mentor in advising doctoral students on statistical design and research methods. His record of academic achievement during his span of faculty service showed superior ratings afforded by students for his classroom teaching and equally high marks given by colleagues and others for promotion and merit salary increases. He was at the peak of his profession when the tax measure was implemented and his status changed to the Emeritus qualification. Later he learned that his release as a full-time professor stemmed from bias in department politics, envy, and favoritism on the part of reduction committee associates. However, after relinquishing his faculty position and breaking from the routine of the campus he went on to become a known national and international figure as a consultant, lecturer, and author. This is his story as documented from annual journal entries, existing class schedules, and contracts that extended over the period of the story. In essence, the story of the years following the authors position as an Emeritus merit the publishing of these memoirs.
