

Joan of Arc: With Ten Illustrations, Seven Etchings and Three Photo-Etchings (Classic Reprint)

Joan of Arc. chapter i. THE CALL. NEVER perhaps in modern times had a ^ country sunk so low as France, when, in the year 1420, the treaty of Troyes was signed. Henry V. of England had made himself master of nearly the whole kingdom ; and although the treaty only conferred the title of Regent of France on the English sovereign during the lifetime of the imbecile Charles VI., Henry was assured in the near future of the full possession of the French throne, to the exclusion of the Dauphin. Henry received with the daughter of Charles VI. the Duchy of Normandy, besides the places conquered by Edward III. and his famous son ; and of fourteen provinces left by Charles V. to his successor only three remained in the power of the French crown. The French Parliament assented to these hard conditions, and but one voice was raised in protest to the dismemberment of France ; that solitary voice, a voice crying in a wilderness, was that of Charles the Dauphin - afterwards Charles VII. Henry V
